Let's open up the process to the individual chemists. Alert the whole team to update their cvs with the latest details which add to their expertise and credibility. For example seminars they have attended, academic programs they are in, new responsibilities they have acquired in the lab. The best of the best of each of us should all appear on one page. Then we subject each revision to rigorous peer review, at the level we might expect a competent defense attorney to test us in court. We all have adequate credentials for the tasks we face. The danger is in fluff presentations. We can cull out the chaff with peer review.

Chuck, any progress with the updated CVs. A chemist is still giving out old CVs despite best attempts to update CVs accurately.
